
LOOKING OUT FOR THE INTERESTS OF MAIN STREET, NOT WALL STREET.

Since the mid 19th century, he has been a silent sentry at the entrance to one of our original branches.

Through the steamboat era and the early railroad days when Dollar was the first bank to enable any individual of whatever means to open a savings account with one single dollar.

Through the Civil War and the rise of our industrial base. Through the Great Depression, during which Dollar Bank's doors never closed and we exhibited one million dollars in cash in one of our lobbies, just to reassure our customers that their money was safe and secure. Through the boom and bust cycles of heavy industry. The emergence of today's new economy. He has seen it all.

And for over 153 years, Dollar Bank has remained steadfastly independent. Answering only to the needs of our customers and the regions we serve.

We remain driven by the same independent spirit that has allowed us to grow through an uncommonly high regard for our customers. We'll stay true to our mission of serving Main Street need, not Wall Street greed.

In today's ever-changing and turbulent financial landscape, while other banks have weakened, we have only grown stronger. Individuals and businesses can continue to count on us, because unlike many banks, we still have money to lend. And, there's one more thing you can count on.

That lion will remain. Rock solid. Looking out for the customers who call Dollar their bank.
